

September 2017

This Factsheet does not bind the Court and is not exhaustive

Surveillance at workplace

Article 8 (right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence) of the European Convention on Human Rights provides that:

"1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

In order to determine whether the interference by the authorities with the applicants' private life or correspondence was necessary in a democratic society and a fair balance was struck between the different interests involved, the European Court of Human Rights examines whether the interference was in accordance with the law, pursued a legitimate aim or aims and was proportionate to the aim(s) pursued.

Monitoring of telephone and internet use

Halford v. the United Kingdom

25 June 1997 (judgment)

The applicant, who was the highest-ranking female police officer in the United Kingdom, brought discrimination proceedings after being denied promotion to the rank of Deputy Chief Constable over a period of seven years. Before the European Court of Human Rights she alleged in particular that her office and home telephone calls had been intercepted with a view to obtaining information to use against her in the course of the proceedings.

The European Court of Human Rights held that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights as regards the interception of calls made on the applicant's office telephones. It first found that the conversations held by the applicant on her office telephones fell within the scope of the notions of "private life" and "correspondence" and that Article 8 of the Convention was therefore applicable to this part of the complaint. The Court further noted that there was a reasonable likelihood that calls made by the applicant from her office were intercepted by the police with the primary aim of gathering material to assist in the defence of the sex-discrimination proceedings brought against them. This interception constituted an interference by a public authority with the exercise of the applicant's right to respect for her private life and correspondence. Lastly, the Court observed that the Interception of Communications Act 1985 did not apply to internal communications systems operated by public authorities and that there was no other provision in domestic law to regulate interceptions of telephone calls made on such systems. It could not, therefore, be said that the interference was "in accordance with the law", since the domestic law had not provided adequate protection to the applicant against interferences by the police with her right to respect for her private life and correspondence. In this case the Court also held that there had been a violation of Article 13 (right to an effective remedy) of the Convention, finding that the applicant had been unable to seek relief at national level in relation to her complaint concerning her office telephones. On the other hand, the Court held that there had been no violation of Article 8 and no violation of Article 13 of the Convention as regards the calls made from the applicant's home, since it did in particular not find it established that there had been interference regarding those communications.

Copland v. the United Kingdom

3 April 2007 (judgment)

The applicant was employed by Carmarthenshire College, a statutory body administered by the State. In 1995 she became the personal assistant to the College Principal and was required to work closely with the newly-appointed Deputy Principal. Before the Court, she complained that, during her employment at the College, her telephone, e-mail and internet usage had been monitored at the Deputy Principal's instigation.

The Court held that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention. It recalled in particular that, according to its case-law, telephone calls from business premises are prima facie covered by the notions of "private life" and "correspondence". It followed logically that e-mails sent from work should be similarly protected, as should information derived from the monitoring of personal internet usage. Concerning the applicant, she had however been given no warning that her calls would be liable to monitoring and therefore had a reasonable expectation as to the privacy of calls made from her work telephone. The same expectation ought to apply to her e-mail and internet usage. The Court also noted that the mere fact that the data may have been legitimately obtained by the college, in the form of telephone bills, was no bar to finding an interference. Nor was it relevant that it had not been disclosed to third parties or used against the applicant in disciplinary or other proceedings. The Court therefore found that the collection and storage of personal information relating to the applicant's use of the telephone, e-mail and internet, without her knowledge, had amounted to an interference with her right to respect for her private life and correspondence. In the present case, while leaving open the question whether the monitoring of an employee's use of a telephone, e-mail or internet at the place of work might be considered "necessary in a democratic society" in certain situations in pursuit of a legitimate aim, the Court concluded that, in the absence of any domestic law regulating monitoring at the material time, the interference was not "in accordance with the law". Lastly, having regard to its decision on Article 8 of the Convention, the Court did not consider it necessary in this case to examine the applicant's complaint also under Article 13 (right to an effective remedy) of the Convention.

Bărbulescu v. Romania

5 September 2017 (Grand Chamber – judgment)

This case concerned the decision of a private company to dismiss an employee – the applicant – after monitoring his electronic communications and accessing their contents. The applicant complained that his employer's decision was based on a breach of his privacy and that the domestic courts had failed to protect his right to respect for his private life and correspondence.

The Grand Chamber held, by eleven votes to six, that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention, finding that the Romanian authorities had not adequately protected the applicant's right to respect for his private life and correspondence. They had consequently failed to strike a fair balance between the interests at stake. In particular, the national courts had failed to determine whether the applicant had received prior notice from his employer of the possibility that his communications might be monitored; nor had they had regard either to the fact that he had not been informed of the nature or the extent of the monitoring, or the degree of intrusion into his private life and correspondence. In addition, the national courts had failed to determine, firstly, the specific reasons justifying the introduction of the monitoring measures; secondly, whether the employer could have used measures entailing less intrusion into the applicant's private life and correspondence; and thirdly, whether the communications might have been accessed without his knowledge.

Opening of personal files stored on a professional computer

Pending application

Libert v. France (no. 588/13)

Application communicated to the French Government on 30 March 2015

The applicant in this case complains in particular of a violation of his right to respect for his private life arising from the fact that his employer (The French national rail company, SNCF) opened files on his professional computer's hard drive named « D:/personal data » without him being present. He was later struck off because of the contents of the files in question.

The Court gave notice of the application to the French Government and put questions to the parties under Article 8 (right to respect for private life) of the Convention.

Video surveillance

Köpke v. Germany

5 October 2010 (decision on the admissibility)

The applicant, a supermarket cashier, was dismissed without notice for theft, following a covert video surveillance operation carried out by her employer with the help of a private detective agency. She unsuccessfully challenged her dismissal before the labour courts. Her constitutional complaint was likewise dismissed.

The Court declared inadmissible, as being manifestly ill-founded, the applicant's complaint under Article 8 of the Convention, finding that the domestic authorities had struck a fair balance between the employee's right to respect for her private life, her employer's interest in the protection of its property rights and the public interest in the proper administration of justice. The Court noted in particular that the measure complained of had been limited in time (two weeks) and had only covered the area surrounding the cash desk and accessible to the public. The visual data obtained had been processed by a limited number of persons working for the detective agency and by staff members of the employer. They had been used only in connection with the termination of her employment and the proceedings before the labour courts. It therefore concluded that the interference with the applicant's private life had been restricted to what had been necessary to achieve the aims pursued by the video surveillance. The Court observed, however, in this case that the competing interests concerned might well be given a different weight in the future, having regard to the extent to which intrusions into private life were made possible by new, more and more sophisticated technologies.

Pending application

Antović and Mirković v. Montenegro (no. 70838/13)

Application communicated to the Montenegrin Government on 3 December 2014

This case concerns the use of video surveillance in university classrooms, which the applicants – two university professors – claim violates domestic data protection law.

The Court gave notice of the application to the Montenegrin Government and put questions to the parties under Articles 8 (right to respect for private life) and 35 (admissibility criteria) of the Convention.

Further reading

See in particular:

- “Personal data protection”, factsheet prepared by the Court’s Press Unit
 - Handbook on European Data Protection Law, European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights / Council of Europe, 2014
 - Council of Europe web page on data protection
-

Media Contact:

Tel.: +33 (0)3 90 21 42 08